The volume of distribution V_d of a drug, or in this case a volume marker, may be defined as the volume in which the drug is distributed. In this case, the volume marker is a dye that is distributed in the extracellular space of the body. The volume of distribution of the dye is approximately 16 L, which is consistent with the volume of the extracellular space in a 70 kg man. This suggests that the dye is distributed in the extracellular space and is not bound to plasma proteins. The volume of distribution of a drug is an important parameter in pharmacokinetics, as it determines the concentration of the drug in the plasma and the rate of elimination. The volume of distribution of a drug is also affected by its binding to plasma proteins and its distribution in different tissues. The volume of distribution of a drug is a measure of the extent to which the drug is distributed in the body. The volume of distribution of a drug is a key parameter in the design of drug formulations and in the prediction of drug behavior in the body.
